The federal government is the largest collector of taxes, accounting for 52 percent of all tax dollars. Peer pressure in Muslim communities in the West, however, receives considerable public and political attention, mostly with regard to the position of women.

The law defines which actions are allowed or banned and regulates some practices. From an Islamic perspective, however, all Understanding law and the state conduct, whether individual or communal, is governed by Sharia. If Muslims feel compelled to observe the rules of Islam that are not allowed or accepted in Western societies, they have two options: either they retreat into isolation, possibly within their own community, just as some of their Christian, Jewish, and other orthodox peers in the West have done, or they try to have the Western legal systems amended so that these accommodate the rules of Islam.

Here are some instances in which state and federal laws come into conflict. Mediation is more flexible than arbitration and allows for compromise. Patterson, James T.
