This raises the question of whether there are non-militarized approaches to restoring the protection and security of diplomats that have been a hallmark of diplomacy throughout centuries. Similar arguments apply to the other great innovation of the post-second-world-war world: the international liberal order. Examples of such consensus would include WHO policies on health issues. International institutions also have a role to play in resolving armed conflict. The practices of digital communication and outreach to foreign and domestic audiences do in fact seem to have disrupted public diplomacy to an extent that deserves urgent examination.
